

THE UNIVERSITY of EDINBURGH

Edinburgh Research Explorer

The Eurozone's Struggling Economies are Increasingly Selling Citizenship to Raise Much Needed Capital

Citation for published version:

Dzankic, J, The Eurozone's Struggling Economies are Increasingly Selling Citizenship to Raise Much Needed Capital, 2012, Web publication/site. <<http://blogs.lse.ac.uk/europpblog/2012/12/17/selling-citizenship-jelena-dzankic/>>

Link:

Link to publication record in Edinburgh Research Explorer

Document Version:

Publisher's PDF, also known as Version of record

Publisher Rights Statement:

© Dzankic, J. (Author). (2012). The Eurozone's Struggling Economies are Increasingly Selling Citizenship to Raise Much Needed Capital.

General rights

Copyright for the publications made accessible via the Edinburgh Research Explorer is retained by the author(s) and / or other copyright owners and it is a condition of accessing these publications that users recognise and abide by the legal requirements associated with these rights.

Take down policy

The University of Edinburgh has made every reasonable effort to ensure that Edinburgh Research Explorer content complies with UK legislation. If you believe that the public display of this file breaches copyright please contact openaccess@ed.ac.uk providing details, and we will remove access to the work immediately and investigate your claim.

Home About Contributors Podcasts Current Themes Thinkers on Europe
Book Reviews

The eurozone's struggling economies are increasingly selling citizenship to raise much needed capital.

How far should countries go to encourage foreign investment?

Jelena Dzankic writes that in a time of economic crisis, some countries in Europe are now seeking investment in exchange for citizenship. Assessing recent developments in Bulgaria, Hungary, Portugal and Ireland, she argues that despite the obvious financial benefits to such policies, they are not without risks. They may raise the potential for tax evasion and security issues, and could also reduce the relationship between the individual and the state to that of a business contract.

While the epidemic of the economic crisis is still troubling Europe, many of the Old Continent's countries seek out creative ways to secure a much needed injection of capital into their struggling economies. Investor programmes, which enable wealthy individuals to gain residence in one of the European countries and eventually access their citizenship, are on the increase. Over the past few months Bulgaria, Hungary, Portugal, and Ireland have opened their borders to investors. Moreover, several other countries are considering this option including the countries aspiring to EU membership, such as Albania and Macedonia. Yet, unlike the Caribbean islands that implement citizenship-by-investment (St. Christopher and Nevis and the Commonwealth of Dominica), European countries require the investors to reside on their soil, which makes the European programmes a bit less controversial. These issues have been examined in detail in an earlier blog. On the one hand, the investor programmes seek to attract foreign investment

Guardian
Comment Network

Recent

New trends in weapons production in East Central Europe reflect major changes in the global arms industry

February 19th, 2015

What can the left learn from Friedrich Hayek?

February 19th, 2015

The demise of symmetry between 'sister parties' has and curtail public debt, thus helping the ailing economies recover. On the other hand, they may lead to the commodification of citizenship, which has as its most obvious consequence the disruption of equality of membership in a polity. This raises the question of whether access to citizenship should be facilitated on grounds of wealth (which is unevenly distributed among individuals) if economic circumstances so require? The most recent European examples offer an insight into this complex issue.

opened up a new chapter in Belgian politics

February 18th, 2015

Subscribe

EUROPP Social Media

Follow EUROPP on Twitter

Turkey/Bulgaria Border Station, Kapikulke (Credit: Christian Koehn, CC BY 2.0)

Most recently, the poorest country of the EU 27, Bulgaria, had introduced a shortcut to an EU passport by opening a citizenship-by-investment programme based on a one year residency and an investment of at least one million Bulgarian Lev (just over half a million euro). The investment was supposed to target Bulgarian companies which have high-priority projects in the fields of industry, infrastructure, transport or tourism. The changes to the Law on Bulgarian Citizenship had been adopted as a consequence of the amendments to the Law on the Promotion of Investment, the latter aiming to reverse the multibillion euro drop in foreign direct investment in the country since the onset of the financial crisis in 2008. However, the amendments to the Law on Bulgarian citizenship were vetoed by the country's President who argued that citizenship should not be 'sold'. The underlying amendments are currently being reconsidered by the Bulgarian Parliament. If adopted, the President will not have the right to veto them for the second time.

The Bulgarian move towards facilitating access to citizenship to investors is not an isolated case among the struggling EU economies. However, other EU Member States that have established such programmes opted for slightly stricter 'premier residence' programmes, which already exist in the United Kingdom, Belgium, Austria, and Latvia. This means that investors will receive residence permits on grounds of their investment, but will still be required to comply with other criteria for naturalisation including multiple years of residence, knowledge of the language, etc. While Spain is currently considering legal changes required to open a premier residence programme for investors, several other EU members have already approved the schemes that – through facilitated residence – link citizenship and wealth.

Earlier in November 2012, Hungary amended its regulation of Entry and Stay of Third-Country Nationals to allow individuals who invest at least 0.25 million euros in government bonds to receive temporary residence of a maximum of five years in Hungary. The underlying investment also facilitates the acquisition of permanent residence in the country, as investors are allowed to apply for permanent residence after six months of continuous residence, unlike other applicants who are eligible for permanent residence after three years.

In October 2012, Portugal adopted a new law enabling applicants to receive a Portuguese visa who either make a capital investment of one million euros, purchase property in the country of at least half a million euros, or establish a business venture that creates at least 30 jobs. Provided that the investment is sustained for at least five years, the investor residence programme will allow the investors to eventually obtain a permanent residence permit in Portugal and apply for Portuguese citizenship in line with the legislation in force.

After having terminated its investor citizenship scheme due to domestic and international criticism in 2001, Ireland, faced with severe public debt, opened an investor programme in mid-2012, allowing wealthy individuals to receive a residence permit for up to five years. In exchange for a residence permit, Ireland requires either a one-off investment of at least half a million euros in a public project in the area of education, health, sports or arts, a one million euro venture capital investment maintained for at least three years benefitting an Irish business, a one million euro combined investment in real estate and government bonds, or a two million euros investment in special immigrant investor bonds maintained for five years. The rationale of the programme is to attract the investors to relocate to Ireland, which would eventually (and subject to other conditions), make them eligible for Irish citizenship.

While on the one hand the investor programmes may boost these countries' economies, they are far from being completely risk free. Issues such as tax evasion have often been cited as a potential result of these programmes, as well as the risks for the recipient countries in being potential hosts to individuals seeking to sidestep criminal charges in their countries of origin. More recently, the security dimension of investor programmes has become an increasingly debated issue. Media reports reveal a growing fear that the political and economic instability in the Middle East after the Arab Spring

Tweets

Follow

LSE EUROPP blog 23m
@LSEEUroppblog

Electoral turnout for young people peaks immediately after their enfranchisement then falls sharply bit.ly/1nkIoss

Reuters Top News 1h
@Reuters

Greece offers concessions to win euro zone loan extension, Germany objects:
reut.rs/1AWMpNM
pic.twitter.com/4c2Smmjs6j

Retweeted by LSE EUROPP blog

Expand

LSE EUROPP blog 1h
@LSEEUroppblog

Arms firms in Central/Eastern Europe are playing a growing role in the global arms industry bit.ly/17Z9owo pic.twitter.com/bX9P3zI5kv

Expand

Tweet to @LSEEUroppblog

could result in a large number of wealthy individuals from these regions benefiting from investor programmes in Europe. Given the shift of global capital eastwards over the last few years, it is to be expected that many wealthy individuals who face travel or other restrictions due to their current nationality (e.g. Russian, Chinese, Syrian, Iranian, Pakistani, etc.) will take advantage of the investor programmes. The investors (and portions of their wealth) will thus relocate to Europe since residence is mandatory to qualify for citizenship under the existing schemes.

While the return of capital may prove beneficial to Europe, the proliferation of investor programmes raises the question of what citizenship means. It is not only the matter of having a passport, but a far more complex notion. First, investor programmes change the nature of the legal link between the individual and the state. They create a de facto business contract between the state and the investor, which entitles the state to waive some or all of the conditions for naturalisation of investors. Regular applicants still need to meet these conditions for naturalisation as they are unable to be a party to the underlying business contract. Second, citizenship grants the individuals the 'right to have rights' in the state while also laying out the duties that they have towards that state. Hence by reducing the link between the individual and the state to a business contract, states effectively commodify not only citizenship but also individual rights, as these will be accessible to the 'investor' citizens on grounds of wealth.

So, even in the context of citizenship, it appears that 'money makes the world go round'...

This article was first posted on the Citsee blog.

Please read our comments policy before commenting.

Note: This article gives the views of the author, and not the position of EUROPP – European Politics and Policy, nor of the London School of Economics.

Shortened URL for this post: <http://bit.ly/UM4vKt>

About the Author

Jelena Dzankic – European University Institute

Jelena Dzankic holds a PhD from the Faculty of Politics, Psychology and Social Sciences (PPSIS) at the University of

Like

5,703 people like EUROPP - European Politics and Policy at L

EU Events Calendar

Click here for this month's upcoming EU related events

Commentary on Europe

› Agenda Pública

› BlogActiv.eu

› bloggingportal.eu

› Bruegel

› Carnegie Europe

› CEPS Commentaries

› Charlemagne's

Cambridge (New Hall College). Her academic interests fall within the fields of transition of SEE countries, Europeanisation, politics of identity and citizenship. Prior to joining the European University Institute, Jelena was part of the CITSEE team at the University of Edinburgh. She has published several articles on the politics of the Balkan region, and since 2009 she has been the country expert on Montenegro at the European Union Democracy Observatory (EUDO) on Citizenship at the Robert Schuman Centre for Advanced Studies.

Share this:

Tweet 51

Like 48

g+ Share 1

Email

Share 1

Many countries in the European Union allow individuals to purchase citizenship. Such 'investor citizenship' is unfair and discriminatory.

In "EU institutions, government and politics and enlargement"

London's Olympics show that the links between sports, citizenship, politics, and national identity are as tangible as ever In "Jelena Dzankic"

Montenegro and its people now face a long and challenging road towards EU accession

In "EU institutions, government and politics and enlargement"

+ Share / Save

December 17th, 2012 | Jelena Dzankic, Justice and home affairs

(including immigration, asylum policies etc) | 3 Comments

◀ Previous post

Next post ▶

3 Comments

Notebook

› EU Energy Policy Blog

› Eudo Cafe

› Euro Crisis in the Press

› European Council on Foreign Relations

› European Parties Elections and Referendums Network \(EPERN\)

› European Public Affairs

› Europedebate.ie

› FRIDE

› Global Europe

› Greece@LSE

› Hertie School of Governance blog

› Ideas on Europe

› Lost in EUrope

› LSEE – Research on South Eastern Europe

› Politics in Spires

› Polscieu

The eurozone’s struggling economies are increasingly selling citizenship to raise much needed capital. | European Finance & Economy | Scoop.it December 18, 2012 at 10:24 pm - Reply

[...] How far should countries go to encourage foreign investment? Jelena Dzankic writes that in a time of economic crisis, some countries in Europe are now seeking investment in exchange for citizenship... [...]

The eurozone's struggling economies are increasingly selling ... | Euro Economics | Scoop.it December 22, 2012 at 5:04 am - Reply

[...] Jelena Dzankic writes that in a time of economic crisis, some countries in Europe are now seeking investment in exchange for citizenship. Assessing recent developments in Bulgaria, Hungary, Portugal and Ireland, she ... [...]

The eurozone’s struggling economies are increasingly selling citizenship to raise much needed capital. | European Affairs | Scoop.it February 6, 2013 at 4:09 pm - Reply

[...] How far should countries go to encourage foreign investment? Jelena Dzankic writes that in a time of economic crisis, some countries in Europe are now seeking investment in exchange for citizenship... [...]

Leave A Comment

Name (required) Email (required) Website

Comment...

POST COMMENT

☐ Notify me of follow-up comments by email.

☐ Notify me of new posts by email.

› Social Europe Journal

› The Forum of European Citizens

› UCL SSEES Research Blog

Funded by HEIF 5

Supported by:

Archive

Select Month

Visitors yesterday

| | |
|-------|-----------------|
| 1,650 | Unique Visitors |
|-------|-----------------|

Powered By Google Analytics

Visit our sister blog:
LSE USAPP blog

LATEST LSE PODCASTS

Structural Crisis of the Modern World-System
[Audio]

February 16, 2015

The Challenge of Big Data
for the Social Sciences
[Audio]

February 16, 2015

Investor Protection in TTIP:
fading democracy or new generation? [Audio]

February 12, 2015

Investor Protection in TTIP:
fading democracy or new generation? [Video]

February 12, 2015

Tuition Fees Assist Access:
discuss [Slides]

February 11, 2015

Syria and the Future of the State Order in the Levant
[Audio]

February 11, 2015

How Good We Can Be:
ending the mercenary society and building a great country [Audio]

February 11, 2015

Children's Rights in the Digital Age [Audio]

February 11, 2015

Tuition Fees Assist Access:
discuss [Audio]

February 11, 2015

Children's Rights in the Digital Age [Video]

February 11, 2015

Visit our sister blog:
LSE Impact of Social Sciences

FORTHCOMING EVENTS AT THE LSE

Between East and West

A Little Gay History

Words in Time and Place

Philanthropic Partnerships:
innovation and social change

Language, Landscape and Identity in Palestine

Brazilian Foreign Policy: a
Q&A session with Minister
Celso Amorim

Accountability to Parliament

An Eye for Life

Foundations of Faith

What Future For World
Society?

Visit our sister blog:
LSE British Politics and Policy

LATEST ARTICLES FROM BPP

Labour's proposed public service reforms won't undo
the effects of privatisation

February 19, 2015

Do party leader approval ratings predict election outcomes?

February 18, 2015

No longer boring and predictable: central bankers have been steering the economy through treacherous rapids

February 18, 2015

Enough is enough: Time to regulate prime ministerial appointments to the Lords

February 18, 2015

Flogging a dead fox: why hunting is still on the agenda – and why it has nothing to do with animals

February 17, 2015

Green Party voters look like Lib Dems, think like Labour voters and are as dissatisfied as 'Kippers

February 17, 2015

Why the UK needs
improved caretaker conventions before the May 2015 general election

February 16, 2015

What can the left learn from Friedrich Hayek?

February 16, 2015

Book Review: Racism,

Visit our sister blog:
LSE Review of Books

LATEST ARTICLES FROM LSE RESEARCH ONLINE

Doctor-patient differences in risk preferences, and their links to decision-making: a field experiment

February 19, 2015

In sickness but not in wealth: field evidence on patients' risk preferences in the financial and health domain

February 19, 2015

Wine judging and tasting

February 19, 2015

Comment on Bruno Frey's
"how should people be rewarded for their work?"

February 19, 2015

Networks, learning
cognition, and economics

February 19, 2015

Digit ratio and risk taking:
evidence from a large,
multi-ethnic sample

February 19, 2015

Getting policy-makers to listen to field experiments

February 19, 2015

Should I pay for your risky behaviours? Evidence from London

February 19, 2015

Advocatus, et non Latro?
Testing the excess of litigation in the Italian courts of justice

February 19, 2015

| | |
|--|--|
| Class and The Racialized Outsider by Satnam Virdee | On the external validity of social preferences games: a systematic lab-field study |
| February 15, 2015 | February 19, 2015 |
| Does diversity erode social cohesion? It depends on how diversity is conceptualized and measured | |
| February 14, 2015 | |